Many years ago, the Romans began to write with a thin stick. It was made of lead. They called it stylus. This stick was later called pencil. But it did not look like the pencil we use today.

Much later, people started writing with a stick made of a soft stone. The stone was called graphite. This stick was very soft and broke easily. It also made the hands of the writer black. People decided to cover the stick. Some covered it with wax. Others put it in a tube. Hundreds of years later, men found a way to put it inside a wooden cover.
